Sending cards is a widespread custom in Britain today. The British have been sending cards since Victorian times when wealthy families started to send Christmas greetings. In the 1980s the card industry rapidly expanded as celebrations became more and more commercialised. There are cards for every occasion from buying a house to having a baby and, more recently, cares for greeting a new job, getting a divorce or just saying “Sorry”. More than one hundred million Christmas cards are sold in Britain every year. However, cards are no longer confined to special celebrations such as birthdays, because there are many less important occasions when people send cards to each other.
